Kaleb helps clients navigate congressional oversight and advance their regulatory, legislative, and administrative priorities, with a focus on solutions that are both workable and durable.

Kaleb spent more than five years as Senior Counsel to the U.S. Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, where he helped manage the committee's oversight work. He knows how congressional investigations and hearings come about, how they unfold, and what committees expect from the people and organizations they examine. He uses that experience to help clients spot oversight risk early, prepare for document requests, briefings, and hearings, and respond in a way that protects their interests and reputation.

As Chief of Staff to U.S. Senator Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, Kaleb was the principal architect of the office's policy, legislative, and communications strategies. Even in a gridlocked Congress, he built productive relationships with members and policy advisors on both sides of the aisle, which helped him build consensus and get solutions enacted.

Today, Kaleb draws on his regulatory, political, and policy experience to guide clients through complex federal and state regulatory processes. He has relationships across federal and state agencies, legislatures, and executive offices, and he knows the decision makers and how to get things done.

Kaleb provides strategic counsel that advances clients' policy and business goals. His work ranges from government engagement on specific projects to broad campaigns, including grassroots advocacy to build community support at the local and statewide levels.

Born and raised in Alaska, Kaleb brings firsthand insight into the issues that matter most to the state.
